RED-LIGHT CAMERAS A SUCCESS

With a year behind them, Toledo's red-light cameras seem to be working well. They are slowing down drivers and cutting the number of crashes. Over 8,600 tickets were given last year. There was also a 25 percent drop in crashes at those intersections, according to city leaders.

Because of their success, the city will install five more cameras at five different intersections. According to Police Chief Mike Navarre, a reduction in crashes cause a reduction in injuries. He stated that we kill more people with cars than we do with guns and knives.

The citations are mailed to the vehicle's owner and carry a $75 fine. The cameras snap pictures of the license plate of vehicles that run red lights.

Officials at the Toledo Police Department recently said that 75 to 80 percent of motorists paid their fines. For the remaining 20 to 25 percent, the city is getting involved with a state program that prevents people from renewing their driver license and vehicle registration for unpaid traffic tickets.

Dayton will install 18 cameras at different intersections later this year. Cincinnati has assembled a task force to study the idea. (source: Redflex Traffic Systems)
